When I was growing up in Boulder, CO, my dad would tell a joke about his fellow workers at the National Bureau of Standards (NBS, now NIST). When asked, "How many people work here?" he would reply, "About half of them." ☺

I never saw that, because the people my dad interacted with were all excellent and passionate in their work. My dad was called, "The nation's timekeeper" by his colleagues.

What would happen if we let go of all those lazy workers throughout the government who are just punching the clock but barely performing; and hang on to those who love their job and serving their community with excellence? Those sticking with it would probably be grateful to get rid of the dead wood bureaucrats who make life difficult for everyone else. Clear the log jam of ridiculous ~~bure~~ bureaucracy. Not only would those remaining survive without the bureaucrats, but they would thrive.

NIST also needs to be purged of all those bastards who created that bogus/cooked⁹¹¹ report explaining "scientifically" how WTC building 7 fell at freefall speed, without the obvious^{nanothermite} demolition charges that brought it down. NIST received

#HalfFedWorks

(e.g. new buildings, remodelling security) perus as a result of that bogus report.
